What Are Matching Matching Cards Used For?

The simplest game lays the cards animal-side up: a child turns a numeral card, then hunts for the dot card showing the same quantity. Because the dot sets use 2 different layouts, children discover that six dots are still six however they are arranged, which moves them from memorising pictures to real quantity sense. Teachers also use the cards to point out groups of five and doubles hidden in the dot patterns.

Older children play comparison games, where each player flips a card and the larger number wins, or look for two dot cards that together make 10 to practise number combinations. With three-year-olds, start with the cards up to 5 and add the rest as confidence grows. The animal pictures on the back make it easy to keep cards face down and to sort sets after play.
