Typical Use

Gloves are worn for almost every task on a clinical bench: receiving and opening sample containers, separating serum, loading analysers, preparing and staining smears, and wiping down surfaces after a spill. Nitrile is a synthetic material, so it is a common choice where staff prefer to avoid natural rubber latex, and the powder-free finish means no powder residue ends up on slides, cuvettes or instrument parts. Because the gloves fit either hand, a box can be used without sorting left from right.

Change gloves between patients' samples and whenever they are torn or visibly contaminated, and never wash or reuse single-use gloves. Remove them by peeling each glove inside out, discard them into biohazard waste, and wash your hands afterwards. Keep boxes in a dark, dry store away from heat and freezing so the material stays supple. Hospitals that buy disposable lab equipment in India in bulk often order gloves on a regular schedule with other daily consumables.
