What Is the Metal-Case Stop Clock Used For?

A bench stop clock is the everyday timer of the science lab. Physics classes use it to time pendulum swings and the oscillations of a mass on a spring, chemistry groups time rates of reaction, and biology practicals time activities such as pulse counts. Because the large dial is visible to a whole group, one clock can serve a demonstration while students record the readings.

For better results, time a number of complete oscillations rather than one and divide, which reduces the effect of human reaction time. Reset the clock before each run, stand it where it will not be knocked, and return it to its foam-lined case after the lesson to protect the mechanism.
