Typical Use

In ENT and nursing teaching, the nose is the entry point to the respiratory tract and the site of many everyday complaints, from blocked passages to nosebleeds. Tutors use this model to walk trainees through the structure of the nose in order, pointing to each numbered feature and checking recall with the key card. Because the stand presents the model upright, it can be positioned on the lecturer's desk and turned to face the class while the lesson moves from external shape to the passages that carry air inward.

In school classes it supports the chapter on the sense organs, where students learn how smell is detected and how the nose prepares air before it reaches the lungs. Between sessions it can stay on display in a glass-fronted cabinet; dust it regularly, keep the key card filed with it, and avoid placing it where the stand could be knocked from a shelf edge.
