What Is the Glass Bottle for Liquids Used For?

This bottle is the classic bench reagent bottle: a small, stoppered container for dilute hydrochloric acid, sodium chloride solution, lime water or distilled water that a group needs within reach during a practical. The narrow mouth lets students pour a thin stream into a test tube or measuring cylinder, and the clear glass shows at once how much is left.

Ground stoppers give a close fit for acids, salts and neutral solutions. For strong alkalis such as sodium hydroxide, a rubber or plastic closure is the safer choice, because alkali can make a ground stopper stick fast in the neck. Label each bottle before filling and keep the stopper on the bench upside down so its ground surface stays clean.
