What Is a Tube Brush Used For?

The brush is made for cleaning bottles — reagent bottles, wash bottles and similar narrow-necked glassware whose inner walls a cloth or sponge cannot reach. Dip it in warm water with a little laboratory detergent, work it in with a gentle twisting motion, then rinse the vessel with tap water followed by distilled water.

Twist rather than force the brush past a tight neck, and wear gloves when washing glassware that held chemicals. The white bristles show clearly when dirt or stain is building up on the brush, and many labs keep separate brushes for chemistry and biology glassware so residues are not carried between them.

What to Specify When Ordering

- Neck and body size of the bottles you want to clean, so a suitable brush can be confirmed
- Number of brushes — one per wash station is common
- Any other cleaning brushes for test tubes or beakers to include in the same quotation
