What Is a Graduated 2 ml Pipette Used For?

Graduated pipettes are the tool of choice when a practical needs several different small volumes from one pipette: setting up a colorimetry standard series with increasing amounts of stock solution, adding varying volumes of substrate in enzyme-rate experiments, or preparing reagent blanks. In microbiology they transfer measured portions during dilution plating.

Before use, check whether the scale runs to the tip or stops above it, as this changes how the last portion is released. Fill with a pipette filler, set the starting level carefully, and read each change in level at eye level so that every tube in a series receives the intended amount.
