What Is the pH Paper Used For?

Biology students use pH paper to test soil extracts, pond and rain water, saliva, fruit juices and the contents of digestion experiments, where the change in acidity shows an enzyme at work. Chemistry classes use it in an acid base indicator activity to sort household substances such as vinegar, soap solution and baking soda along the pH scale, and field groups carry a box to test streams and wells on the spot.

Tear off a small piece, touch it with a drop of the liquid on a clean glass rod or dip it briefly, and compare the colour with the key on the label straight away and in good daylight. Handle leaves with clean, dry fingers or forceps, and close the box immediately after use so that acid or ammonia fumes in the lab do not discolour the remaining paper.
