What Is the Place Value Mat with Stacking Counters Used For?

A child draws a place value card, reads the number and builds it on the mat by stacking the right number of counters in each place. The colour coding keeps each place visually separate, so the difference between the tens stack and the thousands stack is obvious at a glance. The largest number, 99,999, is simply nine counters in every place.

From there, pupils say the number aloud, write it in words and record its expanded form, covering all three representations in one activity. The counters also model operations: when a place reaches ten counters in an addition, they are exchanged for one counter in the next place to the left, which makes regrouping concrete. The kit works well in a junior lab kit collection for the primary school maths room.

What to Specify When Ordering

- Number of kits — for example one per pupil pair or small group, based on class size.
- Contents check — each kit is listed with a place value mat, 45 cards and 125 counters in 5 colours.
- Extra counters — the separate Stacking Counters item can be quoted alongside if you need more.
- Desk space — the listed size is 30 cm x 27 cm.
