What Is the Surgical Mask Used For?

A surgical mask is worn by the person carrying out a procedure to help keep droplets from their own nose and mouth away from the patient, the work area or an open culture. Typical uses include minor procedures, dressing changes, sample collection, ward rounds and aseptic work in a clinical or microbiology teaching lab. The blue colour is the familiar clinical shade, so staff and students recognise it quickly.

“Non-oil” aerosol type means the mask is meant for water-based droplets and dry particles, not for oily mists such as those from machine lubricants. Put on a fresh mask for each procedure, avoid touching the front while wearing it, and dispose of it after use. Keep unopened stock in a dry store and issue the oldest boxes first so that masks are used within the stated shelf life.

Supplier

ScienceLab is the name under which Jain Scientific Equipments Private Limited, Ambala, Haryana, trades. The company supplies this Surgical Mask as a sourced clinical consumable, grouping it with gloves, drapes and theatre wear when hospitals, nursing schools and laboratories ask for one quotation, for delivery in India and international markets.
